Adsorption in activated carbon for wastewater treatment

The solid that is used universally in the treatment of water is activated carbon, although in recent years, various solid materials have been developed that improve the properties of activated carbon in certain applications. There are two traditional ways of using activated carbon, with different properties and using it in different applications:

The Biological Activated Carbon Process for Water Purification

Due to their inherent and/or man-made macroporous structure, adsorption capacity, and surface chemistry, most commercially available granular activated carbons are excellent support media for biological treatment of drinking water. Under water treatment conditions, similar performance has been obtained for the biological removal of dissolved organics with various activated carbons made from sources such as coal, lignite, and wood. Minor differences in performance have been shown in cold water.
